Transferencia de Calor. Trayas Trayas (or, “Trayas”, or “Trezas”) is a pre-Hispanic civilization of the area of Choluteca-Trujillo in the Mesoamerican region which was located in the state of Hidalgo. The culture was named after the main structure of the site, the “Puerta de Tierra”, which was found during a reconstruction project, and the ruins of the ancient city of Chicunapan, to the northeast of the door. The Puerta de Tierra is a large temple located in a great defensive wall that was built before the construction of the neighboring pyramid, It was built in the Preclassic period (most likely during the Late or Early ). As indicated by the excavated reliefs, the temple has two access ways, in particular, the south facing door which gives access to a wide nave and another door that is protected by a perforated stone shield. It was reconstructed during the 20th Century. This structure had the following: -height:, -length: , -width:, -surrounding nave:, -surrounding parapet:, -height of the roof:, -east facing door:, -north facing door:. This temple is possibly a part of the great observatory in Choluteca (today known as La Antigua) and has a solar orientation that is formed by a line of engravings that encircled the temple, as in the temple the Tres Oíos, or three eyes of the Maya sun. This coincides with the common building format in the Maya area at the time when the structure was built, with the central temple separated from the outer nave by an exterior wall. This format, which was also used in the close by pyramid at Solola by the same culture group. The huge temple at Choluteca La Antigua was constructed with the aid of masonry craftsmen who used to make their tools and products using hot metals that were placed in fire. This culture had a great knowledge of metal, its preparation and use was well known as indicated by the dating of the “Trayas civilization”, since metals was used as a funerary ritual. The Trujillo Archaeology Museum currently has the best collection of the “Tray

Walker Cell, is of intense interest to those interested in atmospheric circulation patterns. The basic physical conditions that produce the Walker Cell are well known, and the length scale that is responsible for rapid vertical motions (the eddy length) is well established. In this paper we present a simple experiment designed to test the possibility of global averaging of two consecutive equatorial Walker cells. We find that the result of such an experiment is altered by that averaging and that in the case of the Indian Ocean a global average of these two cells has little or no effect on the vertical velocity profile. That result is not consistent with the theory of Ramaswamy (1997). Yet our simple experiment has a much larger consequence. It suggests that the very large scale circulation observed over the equator is not that of a single global circulation cell.//===-----
